Abstract

We present a subjective list of the Recent, free-living, non-marine ostracods species and genera of the world, with their distribution in the large zoogeographical regions, as well as a list of genera in their present hierarchical taxonomic position. Based on the recognised synonymies, there are at present about 2090 species in c. 209 genera. About half of all species occur in one family, the Cyprididae, which is especially common in the southern Hemisphere. We give three new names for extant homonyms (Cypretta bradyi nom. nov., Cypria kliei nom. nov. and Physocypria dadayi nom. nov.), propose one new combination and one new synonymy and elevate the rank of the tribe Mytilocypridini to that of subfamily (with the same diagnosis).

Introduction

Non-marine, aquatic biodiversity is declining rapidly, faster than terrestrial or marine diversity (Dudgeon et al. 2006). In addition, non-marine aquatic habitats hold a much higher diversity than terrestrial and marine ones of comparable sizes: freshwater comprises only 0.01% of all water on the planet and occupies only 0.8% of the Earth's surface, yet it holds about 12% of all known animal species, including 40% of all fish species and 1/4 of all vertebrates. This incongruence between diversity and occupied surface is known as the paradox of freshwater (Lévêque et al. 2005).

In order to establish more precise species numbers of the various freshwater groups, the Royal Belgian Institute of natural Sciences and the Belgian Biodiversity Platform (Brussels) conducted the "Freshwater Animal Diversity Assessment", an initiative that involved c. 150 taxonomic experts, covering all freshwater animal groups (Balian et al. 2008; <http://FADA.biodiversity.be>). The Ostracoda (small, bivalved crustaceans, which abound in all aquatic, marine and freshwater, and even in (semi-) terrestrial environments) were analysed by Martens et al. (2008). They found that there are at present c. 2000 species in c. 200 genera; the family Cyprididae in the superfamily Cypridoidea is the most diverse group and comprises more than 50% of all extant non-marine ostracod species.

The present checklist is an updated and expanded version of the one used by Martens et al. (2008). It enumerates names of classic species and genera described up to 2008 (with some selected species described later also being included), providing synonyms as well as broad distribution of species over the main zoogeographical regions. The present list includes only the free-living non-marine ostracod species, the parasitic/symbiotic Entocytheridae are not listed here. Readers are referred to the monograph by Hart & Hart (1974), to which little has been added in later years.

Recently, there is a pronounced interest in so-called cryptic species in several (mostly aquatic) groups (see review in Bickford et al. 2007). Such species can only be identified with molecular methods, and are generally not morphologically recognisable. Bode et al. (2010) analysed almost 450 specimens from c. 135 European populations of the temporary pool ostracod species, Eucypris virens (Jurine, 1820), and found close to 40 cryptic species, some sexual, some asexual, within this one classic species. Preliminary experiments also showed that amongst the sexual clusters, males preferred females belonging to the same cluster (Schmit et al. in prep.), supporting the specific status according to the biological species concept for at least some of these clusters. It is at present unclear if such cryptic species should be formally described, but it is now certain that at least E. virens should be considered a species complex. It belongs to the family Cyprididae, and several more taxa belonging to this family have similar morphological and molecular diversities as E. virens (e.g. Cypridopsis vidua (O.F. Müller, 1776), Heterocypris incongruens (Ramdohr, 1808)). It is thus important to take into account that the actual (cryptic) diversity in non-marine ostracods might be much higher than the classic specific diversity, as indicated in the present checklist. Whereas previously the presence of E. virens was simply noted as one species, it is now clear that a ‘classic’ population of E. virens can comprise anything between one and a dozen cryptic species (Bode et al. loc.cit.). We should urgently assess the extent of cryptic diversity in this group (and others), because what we do not know, we cannot protect.

Procedure and Literature used

The basis for the present subjective checklist was the series of objective species lists in the “Kempf Database Ostracoda” (KDO) (Kempf 1980a–d, 1997a–d, 2006 and subsequent unpublished updates). We also follow, as much as possible, Kempf’s decisions on what constitutes a freshwater species. This way, some brackish water species are included, others are not. Higher taxonomy follows Horne et al. (2002), unless mentioned differently. The present list was drafted in different stages.

1. The above indexes (KDO) contain both fossil and Recent species, so an objective list of Recent species was first drafted. We only consider living species, so species described on (sub-) fossil valves only are not included, unless when they constitute the type species of a genus with also living representatives, such as Tonnacypris.
2. Subsequently, for each species the different combinations were checked in the KDO. The most recent combinations were retained, the older ones were cited below this most recent combination.
3. These combinations were then checked against recent revisions (e.g. Martens 1986 for Megalocypridinae; Martens 1990, 1992 for Cypridini; Gonzalez et al. 1996 for Herpetocypris; Rossetti & Martens 1998 for Darwinulidae and others), extant checklists (De Deckker & Jones 1978 for Australia; Martens 1984 for Africa; Martens & Behen 1994 for South America) as well as websites (NODE for Europe <http://biobel.biodiversity.be/project/show/2337>; and NANODE for North America (<http://www.personal.kent.edu/~alisonjs/nanode/>); and if necessary, updated and/or changed.
4. Finally, most older and all recent (until 2008) literature has been screened to check for (1) new species and genera not included in checklists and revisions, (2) new combinations of species and genera, (3) new synonymies and (4) presence/absence in different zoogeographical regions. Various papers not used by Martens et al. (2008) were here included, most noteworthy the monograph on NW Australian interstitial Candoninae by Karanovic (2007) and the monographic treatises on Cypricerinae by Savatnalinton & Martens (2009, 2010) and on Japanese Candoninae by Smith & Janz (2008), but also dozens of shorter contributions (not listed here).

It is thus important to note that the present list is fully subjective, and represents the taxonomic views of the authors. In addition, as perfection is not of this world, omissions and erroneous interpretations will doubtlessly occur. The authors invite readers to send comments to the corresponding author; updated versions of the present database will be posted on http://fada.biodiversity.be/group/list?current_page=groups.

Taxonomic notes

1. Synonymies

- a. Synonymies should preferably be based on investigation of type (or at least topotypical) materials, and on descriptions only if they are exhaustive and detailed. This guideline was used when considering whether or not to accept synonymies. Several proposed synonymies, for example for North American and European candonids, are thus not retained here
 - b. Okubo (1990) synonymised Heterocypris takedai Okubo, 1973 with Heterocypris bulgarica Sywula, 1967. However, as this species itself was already synonymised with Heterocypris barbara (Gauthier & Brehm, 1928), H. takedai automatically becomes a synonym of H. barbara.
2. There is at present some discussion on the resurrection of old generic names, for example the genus Typhlocypris Vejdovsky, 1882 for several species of the presently used genus Pseudocandona Kaufmann, 1900. These issues remain to date unresolved, but in the interest of nomenclatorial stability we have decided not to use these old names and to continue to use well-known nomenclature, as is done in frequently used hand books such as Meisch (2000). Similarly, Cypris intermedia latialis Masi, 1905 is to all probability an unused senior synonym of Herpetocypris helenae G.W. Müller, 1908. However, as (1) the synonymy is uncertain, (2) the type material of latialis is unknown and (3) the name H. helenae is widely used, we do not use the unknown senior synonym.
3. Three species were clear homonyms and needed a new name. The following new names are here proposed
- a. Cypretta bradyi nom. nov. for Cypretta sarsi Brady, 1902 (from the Africatropical region) nec Moniez, 1892 (from the Oriental Region)
 - b. Cypria kliei nom. nov. for Cypria pelagica Klie, 1932 (from the Oriental Region) nec Brehm, 1932 (from the Neotropical Region). This case was somewhat problematic as both species were described in the same year. However, Brehm's species was published in an issue of Zoologischer Anzeiger dated 26 June 1932. On the cover of the journal in which Klie's species appeared (Archiv für Hydrobiologie, Suppl. 11 Tropische Binnengewässer) only the year of publication appeared. For such cases, the ICZN (2000) stipulates in article 21.3(2) that: "If the day of publication is not specified in a work, ... , the last day of the year when only the year is specified or demonstrated" counts as day of publication. Following this logic, Brehm's species has priority, and we thus give a new name for Klie's species.
 - c. Physocypris dadayi nom. nov. for Physocypris denticulata (Daday, 1910) (from the Afrotropical region) nec (Daday, 1905) from the Nearctic and Neotropical regions. The status of the latter should be investigated, as it might very well be synonymous with another species in this genus.

4. New combination: Dolerocypris marina Hartmann, 1965 is here transferred to Tanycypris Triebel, 1959.

5. Higher taxonomy: we decided not to propose new higher taxa (tribes and higher) in the present publication, as creating such taxa should be done with full discussion and illustration of relevant characters and character states.

We do elevate Mytilocypridini De Deckker, 1974 to the rank of subfamily (with the same diagnosis as for the tribe), because it constitutes a clear cluster of related genera which does not fit any of the diagnoses of other extant subfamilies.

According to the present authors, the genera Amphicypris Sars, 1901, Cypriconcha Sars, 1926, Alboa De Deckker, 1981, Bennelongia De Deckker & McKenzie, 1981, Chlamydotheca Saussure, 1858 and Neocypridella Vávra, 1895 belong in subfamilies other than those in which they are classified now (and are listed here). These transfers will be done elsewhere and these genera are thus presently left in the subfamilies to which they have previously been assigned.

6. Yu et al. (2009) presented an annotated checklist of what they call 'recent' non-marine Ostracoda from China, and cited 154 valid species in 62 genera. They thus updated the checklist by Yin & Martens (1997), who listed only 47 species. However, Yin & Martens (1997) took the definition of ‘Recent’ as ‘living’, the same as is done in the present checklist (see above). Yu et al. (2009) included many taxa that were actually (sub-) fossil, or at best sub-recent. These are excluded from the present checklist and 60 species and 16 genera from the Yu et al. (2009) checklist are thus not included here. Most of these fossil taxa also have an uncertain taxonomic status. For example, Gobiocypris triangulata was described from Lake Erhai (Huang, 1983 in Yu et al. 2009), but the genus Gobiocypris Brady & Robertson, 1870 was already listed under ‘Ostracodum generae and species insertae sedis’ by Müller (1912), because it was and is very doubtful that the European specimens on which this genus was erected were actually true ostracods. A taxonomic revision of these Chinese taxa is urgent and necessary.

Format

The following information is provided:

- Table 1: the hierarchical taxonomic position of the extant genera of non-marine Ostracoda.
- Table 2: An alphabetic list of genera and of species within genera. Within this list we provide:
 - Valid species and genus names, with author and year
 - Original combination of species and genus name, if different from the present one
 - List of synonyms of genera and species
 - Type species of genera as indicated with an ‘*’
 - Occurrence of species in zoogeographical regions: the borders of the different regions are as described and illustrated in Balian et al. (2008). The following abbreviations apply:

PA: Palaearctic Region, NA: Nearctic Region, AT: Afrotropical Region, NT: Neotropical Region, OL: Oriental Region, AU: Australasian Region, ANT: Antarctic Region, PAC: Pacific Region and Oceanic Islands.

Main Results

The present list contains 2103 subjective species and 209 genera of Recent, free-living, non-marine Ostracoda of the world. Most species have been described from the Palaearctic area, which includes the species-rich Lake Baikal (Siberia). In general, ancient lakes hold about 25% of all known species (see also Martens et al. 2008).

Nevertheless, the present counts are almost certainly underestimations, for the following reasons:

- There are thus far only few surveys of (sub-) tropical regions (Sars (1901) on South America, Klie (1932) and others on South East Asia and exactly these areas are expected to be most species rich;
- Several ancient lakes hold many as yet undescribed classic (morpho-) species (Martens 1994). Martens (2003) found at least 40 undescribed in no more than 4 samples of the African Lake Malawi;
- As mentioned above, Bode et al. (2010) found close to 40 cryptic species in one classic ostracod species, while Martens et al. (unpubl.) have meanwhile also found cryptic species in the ancient Lake Tanganyika;
- The incredible wealth of candonid diversity, both at the species and genus level, in subterranean waters of North-West Australia (Karanovic 2007) indicates that further exploration of Gondwanian interstitial faunas might yield many more new and endemic taxa.

Acknowledgements

We dedicate this paper to Prof Em E. Kempf, in honour of his ceaseless efforts to compile and update the various parts of the Kempf Ostracoda Database. The work of generations of ostracodologists has been facilitated because of the presence of this very useful tool. Dan L. Danielopol (Austria), Renate Matzke-Karasch (Germany), Claude Meisch (Luxembourg), Burkhard Scharf (Germany), Robin Smith (Japan) and one anonymous referee provided very useful comments and corrected various errors and omissions, although all remaining errors of course still remain the sole responsibility of the authors.
